

Headachy and hung-over, with a backpack of stolen money and not a single pair of underwear (though she did remember her lipstick), Terra arrives in Nakasee Lake on an early-morning bus, after an alcohol-fuelled fight with her (now ex-) boyfriend, Hugh. Charmed by the mountains and intrigued by the locals, Terra buys the cafe on the main street. It's a ramshackle place, full of broad-shouldered and silent mountain men who pour their own coffee and never meet anyone's eye. She settles in to this small town where nobody asks questions, and where she is free to begin again – the right way, this time. She's in flight from more than a dead-end life back in Edmonton, however. A damaged child who has grown into a damaged woman, Terra drinks secretly at six o'clock in the morning, and cuts her arms when things get to be too much. But the looming purple Rocky Mountains and the daily routine of her life at the cafe soothe her, reassure her, make her feel safe and protected. Just as she begins to think that she's escaped the darkness of the basement, tragedy strikes Nakasee Lake. Suddenly, everyone is trying to make sense of the senseless thing that has happened: children lost, their grieving parents in flight, the remaining town residents in silent pain and deep denial. Two years after what happened that day, a man comes to the town, a drifter who arrives with not much more than the bag on his back and a paint brush. Aaron has a gift to give the people of Nakasee Lake, and it's one that they need desperately in order to heal – if only they can believe in what he is telling them. And if they will listen to their dead.
